Lloyds appoints Natasha Condon as Global Head of Transaction Banking

- Natasha brings more than 20 years' experience in trade finance and working capital
- Appointment supports Lloyds' ambition to deepen relationships with corporate and institutional clients

Lloyds has appointed Natasha Condon as Global Head of Transaction Banking for its Corporate & Institutional Banking business, strengthening its focus on helping clients manage cash, working capital, trade and payments.

Natasha will report to John Langley, CEO of Corporate & Institutional Banking.

Natasha brings more than 20 years' experience in trade finance and working capital, most recently as Global Head of Trade Commercialisation at J.P. Morgan, where she worked for over six years. Prior to this, Natasha worked at Citi for over 15 years, including as Managing Director for Global Trade Sales.

Natasha also serves as Chair of the Bankers Association for Finance and Trade's (BAFT) Global Trade Industry Council, a role she has held since 2025.

John Langley, CEO of Corporate & Institutional Banking at Lloyds, said: "Transaction banking is an important part of our growth ambitions and central to becoming an even more strategic partner to our clients. Natasha has a strong track record of combining deep product expertise with innovation, helping some of the world's largest companies improve working capital, manage risk and use digital solutions to support growth.

"I am looking forward to working with Natasha, whose experience will help us bring the best of our capabilities to clients, leveraging innovation and delivering more connected solutions. I'd also like to thank Surath Sengupta for the important role he has played in developing our transaction banking business."

Natasha Condon, Global Head of Transaction Banking, said: "I'm excited to join Lloyds at an important point in the development of its transaction banking business. Businesses are looking for smarter, simpler and more connected ways to manage cash, working capital, trade and payments. I'm looking forward to working with colleagues across Lloyds to build on the progress already made, helping our clients to grow and invest."
